One of Italy's most widely grown vegetables is used not as a direct food product but as a sweetening source: the sugar beet. Italy in 2007 grew 4.7 million metric tons making it the 15th largest producer of the root vegetable worldwide, according to the FAO. Italian sugar beets grow largely in the northern region of the country.

Italian Difference | Made in Italy

Italian food, crucially, has simplicity at its heart - fresh ingredients from the ground, grown under that wonderful Mediterranean sunshine, cooked simply and with love and care. The care taken in preparing it is part of the culture - the slow food movement started in Italy as a backlash against the creeping anathema of fast food.
